The Speed of Flight
by Maren O. Mitchell

Driving home up Little Mountain, numb from mindless work, it isn’t the whole range of the flight of the crow that I can’t believe, wings, body coordinating through one cycle of two beats.

It is the solid mustache-shaped down stroke

that stops,
and will not rise
to be the lifting forward against a lighter sky, preceding the unlikely up up once more of wings

that come down
come down again.